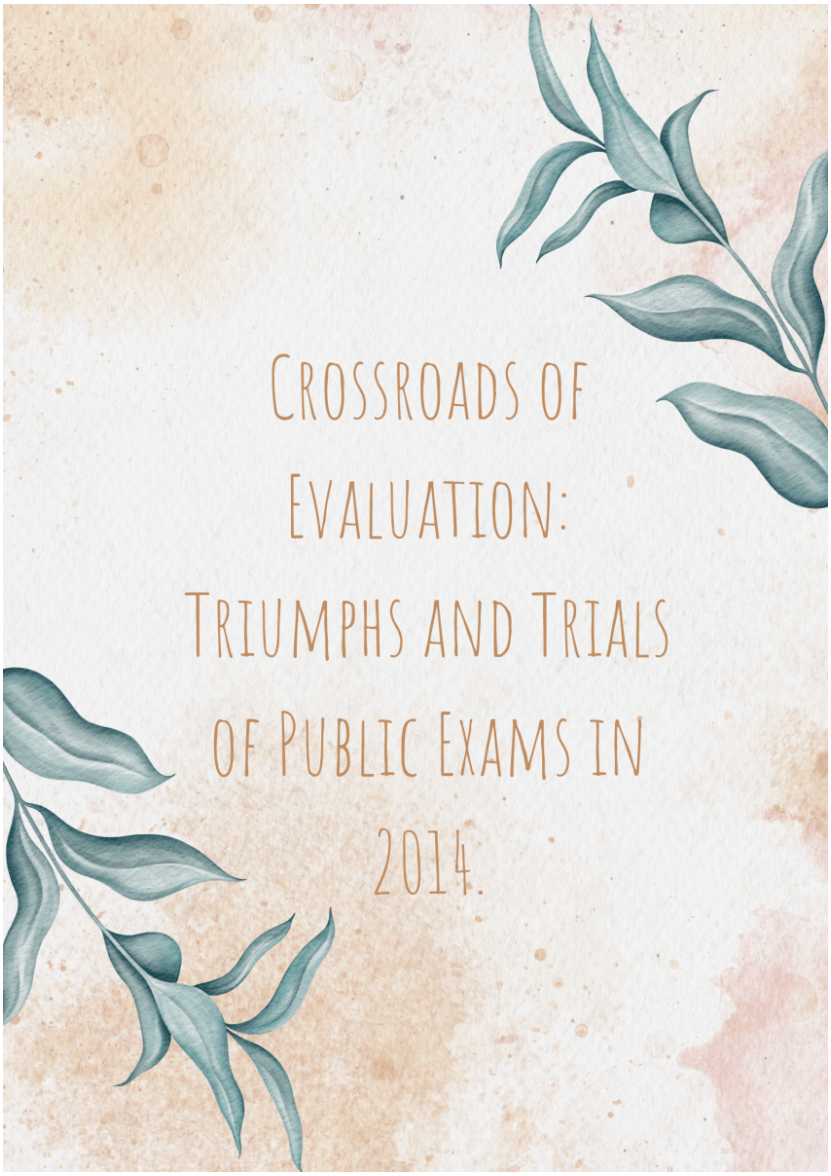
Crossroads of Evaluation: Triumphs and Trials of Public Exams in 2014.

thelifeofmine3.wordpress.com/2022/03/20/public-exams-2014/

March 20, 2022



On March 3, 2014, it was the final day of school and also our first public exam. Before leaving, the principal, Mam, gave us advice and wished us luck for our exams. As I passed by my classroom, I couldn't help but feel a sense of sadness, knowing that these were my last memories of my school.

We followed the school bus to the public school where our exams were held. Appa and I followed in our Omni car. My friends wished me luck for the exams, which meant a lot to me.

I was a little nervous as I sat in the staff room before the exam. However, being there felt fine. Miss Sundari, who had only substituted in my class a few times over the past two years, consoled me and advised the teachers to take care of me during the public exam.

Her kind words and good luck wishes made me incredibly happy.

On March 11, 2014, I bought slippers for the first time since my accident because we had to wear them for the public exams. There was a silver tag in them that Appa identified as “mitti,” which brought a smile to my face. During the exams, Dhana Jothi looked even more beautiful. We used to be quite close, but things had changed between us.

I noticed Gowshik Pradeep, and he addressed me. On March 13, 2014, I had my math exam. This exam was important to me as I wanted to prove myself. The past two years of studying math had been challenging for me, and I was extremely concerned about this exam. I prayed fervently, seeking guidance and support.

On April 14, 2014, unfortunately, my supervisor for the math exam was the same math sir who had taught me a lot of problems. I managed to complete one word and two mark questions. I was extremely grateful to God for this. Any score above 90 that I would achieve in math would undoubtedly be due to the guidance and teachings of that sir. My main focus was on performing well in my exams.

On March 17, 2014, my performance in the chemistry exam was not as good as I had hoped. It didn’t go as well as I had anticipated.